There is a limit to how many instances of a script can run at a time. That is to say that your program will stop when it hits the limit. By using the command line arguments to xargs you can tell it that the process does not need to wait for the command to finish before moving on to the next one. You could specify that it does not wait by putting & at the end. That will cause it to run in the background. There are two very useful parameters: -n -L The first one does what I said earlier: it will not wait. The -n tells it to not wait. The -L tells it to run multiple commands in a row, but the last one will not wait. That is what you want. Finally, there is one more trick to know about in xargs. It is that if you do not specify any options for xargs, it will assume you want to read from the stdin. That means that if you have a file that you want to run the command on, you do not need to specify the input, but you do need to specify the output file name. For example, you could do this: $ xargs
