Refer: Access to a marijuana grow facility in the back of a city-owned refrigeration facility in Colorado Springs has been closed to the public after officials learned the drug was being stored there. The closure was prompted by a Nov. 16 incident in which a door was damaged at the scene, according to the city of Colorado Springs, but no marijuana was found. The door was boarded over, and signs were posted Thursday telling visitors that the area was closed. "The city is working closely with the city attorney's office to identify the appropriate enforcement action and pursue charges," the city said in a statement. According to the city, the doors were damaged when a drone was used to conduct surveillance inside the facility. The city is aware that the property had been used to grow marijuana for "several years," but "that does not excuse the damage done to the building, which has resulted in the closure of the premises." On Nov. 1, the city placed the 5,000-square-foot grow facility at 50 N. Cascade Ave. under an annual use permit, which can be issued for a maximum of one year. Any unapproved use of the property, including marijuana, is illegal, the city said. Among the people named in the permit is 40-year-old Jason Kimball. He owns the property and is the president of Medical Marijuana Inc., a real estate company
