For some, the term 'liturgical music' might evoke thoughts of a holy host borne by the choir, and the occasional organ accompaniment. But liturgical music is so much more than that. It's a term that can mean many things, depending on the context. Some can also include choral music, where all members of the choir together sing the same melody, even though they're not playing the same instruments. For example, a song with a Latin text could feature a soprano, alto, tenor, and bass part, all singing the same words in Latin, and harmonising together. It's the kind of music that's made up of several parts, but which is part of something greater. The overarching unity of worship is the purpose of this choral music, and the congregation sings the words of the hymn as a choir. It's music that can express emotion, from mourning to joy. It can be simple and quiet, or it can be extravagant and loud. It can be set to a hymn, or it can be something entirely unique. It's very much like the real world, where things aren't always as they appear. We often focus on the things that are easy to see, the things that are right in front of us. But if we're not careful, we can miss the beauty of the world beyond our eyes, because we're in a rush to reach a destination. We have the ability to use music to express all of the things that are hidden away from us, and this includes emotion. It is the way of the world that we can express emotion through music, and it is the key to realising the true meaning of liturgical music.
