The invention further relates to the use of these analogs as cell adhesion molecules in treating wounds and diseases. An extracellular matrix protein has been isolated from human placenta. This protein, known as laminin, has been shown to have affinity for.alpha.-laminin, a heterotrimeric molecule that includes subunits.alpha.2,.beta.1, and.gamma.1. The laminin molecule has been shown to be closely involved with the basement membrane, which plays a role in epithelial cell attachment and the development of the mesenchymal tissue. This heterotrimeric molecule has been isolated and characterized from human placenta as well as several species of mammals. Laminin has a molecular mass of approximately 800,000, consists of three non-identical chains (designated A, B1 and B2) of disulfide-bonded.alpha. and.beta. polypeptide subunits,

Publisher : EKOPRES .In a multi-level cell (MLC) flash memory cell, the cell voltage of different levels (i.e., programming voltage, erase voltage, read voltage) are applied to different terminals of the cell for programming, erase, and read. Referring to FIG. 1, in a typical MLC flash memory cell, the drain and source are coupled to the drain and source terminals 10, respectively, of a capacitor cell 12 by a stack of program and erase tunneling dielectrics 14, which is in turn coupled to a respective bitline 16, 18. The control gate 20 is coupled to a voltage (Vg), which is typically either a read or a program voltage, via a stack of 2d92ce491b
