The nuclear distribution of neurons in the medial and lateral divisions of the gigantocellular reticular nucleus (Gi) and their relative distributions with respect to cochlear and brainstem afferents were determined in four cats by using retrograde fluorescent dye techniques and observation of antidromic activation of Gi neurons by electrical stimulation of the cochlear nucleus. The medial Gi (Gi-m) had a more extensive distribution in the medial vestibular nuclei (MVN) than in the lateral Gi (Gi-l), but the relative distributions of neurons in the medial and lateral divisions of Gi with respect to cochlear and brainstem afferents were similar in the MVN and to a lesser extent in the lateral vestibular nuclei (LVN). In the Gi-m, afferents from the cochlear nucleus (CN) dominated in neuronal distributions, with smaller proportions of inputs from the brainstem and from the inferior colliculus (IC). In the Gi-l, both afferents from the CN and brainstem dominated in neuronal distributions, with smaller proportions of inputs from the IC. There were also differences in the distributions of GABA
