CT angiography of the abdominal aorta: technique and clinical applications. Computed tomographic angiography of the abdominal aorta was performed on 97 patients. The technique used for contrast enhancement of the abdominal aorta in these patients includes sequential injection of contrast material followed by breath-hold. All patients received an injection of 100 ml of nonionic iodine contrast material intravenously at a rate of 3 ml/s. The sequence of the scan was made from the level of the aortic bifurcation to the level of the upper thighs. The scan was initiated at a CT number of 60 Hounsfield units (HU) and continued until the CT number reached 100 HU. This is the optimal CT number for three-dimensional (3D) reconstruction of the abdominal aorta. After the scan, each patient was asked to take a deep breath. The patients then underwent abdominal dynamic contrast-enhanced CT angiography (CTA). The data were reconstructed into sagittal and coronal images with a thickness of 1.5 mm. An abdominal arterial phase was defined as the period from the aortic bifurcation to the level of the bifurcation of the renal arteries. The abdominal venous phase was defined as the period between the bifurcation of the renal arteries and the level
