FIFA's game development team created the technology using its previous FIFA titles, and they've said that they're watching closely to make sure that the updates don't have an adverse impact on gameplay. "The impact on individual player behaviors in real-time is marginal," said Peter Hinch, the game's lead gameplay engineer. "We're making big, broad changes to the way we do things around speed and how players interact with each other. In that regard, we're very comfortable that player behaviors will be fine." FIFA 22 will still use EA's "I-KICK," or Impact Engine, but the game will incorporate moves from the new engine and old ones. Hinch explained that FIFA 22 will start with the new engine and then use its old libraries as needed to support additional features. The upgraded engine gives greater control over the game's physics, new animations and new animation cuts based on player and player position. It also features an improved ball kicking model with a greater sensation of kicking. Players can also exhibit more accurate dribbling and ball control when they are down the pitch. That's due to the new "mobility and agility system," which is designed to better emulate real-life movement. "The greatest challenge was getting the ball to move naturally in a realistic way, in multiple directions and up and down the pitch," said Hinch. "Mobility and agility is really the reason for the ability for the ball to move very naturally. The challenge there was getting that natural behavior to look that natural and feel that natural as well." FIFA titles usually run with a locked framerate, but FIFA 22 will run at up to 180 frames per second. The game will also have a "sugar" system that slows down real-time game events like dribbling, running and shooting, although the player's actions still play at normal speed. Hinch mentioned that some of the game's updates will enable a greater level of play, which will allow players to make better decisions and improve their skills in the game. "We're making our game an even more dynamic sport to make it more realistic and immersive," said Hinch. "We're making it less predictable. We're making more unexpected things
